

Heat moves from a warmer region to a cooler region. Conduction transfers thermal energy through direct contact between particles. A metal spoon becomes warm when its tip remains in hot soup because energy passes through the metal.

Convection transfers energy through the movement of a fluid. Warm water rises while cooler water sinks, creating a circulating current. Radiation transfers energy by electromagnetic waves and does not require matter; sunlight can therefore warm Earth through space.